Theories and Applications in Contemporary Ethics

A Cross-Disciplinary Offering
CEED 6100 (3 credits)

19-21 May, 2020
9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Online Course

Course Requirements
- Readings
- Response Papers
- Online Discussions/Activities
- Post-Workshop Paper
  (in the student’s area of interest)

Course Description
This intensive graduate-level course is designed to provide cross-disciplinary perspectives on moral theory and applied ethics. Using a team-teaching approach, this course brings together faculty from six disciplines to provide foundational knowledge about moral theory with contemporary applications. In addition to online lectures, students and faculty will participate in seminar and case discussions that connect these various perspectives together and apply them to issues of current social and political importance.

Course Schedule
Day 1 | Identity Formation: Theological and Sociological Perspectives
Day 2 | Identity Stereotypes: Implications for Gender and Criminal Justice
Day 3 | Identity Categories: Implications for Political and Legal Inclusion and Exclusion

Participating Faculty
Michael Baur, JD, PhD | Law/Philosophy
Selin Gülgöz, PhD | Psychology
Thomas Massaro, SJ, PhD | Theology
E. Doyle McCarthy, PhD | Sociology/American Studies
Zein Murib, PhD | Political Science
Steven Swartzer, PhD | Center for Ethics Education

Open to all Graduate Students & Select Seniors | Master of Arts in Ethics and Society Core Course

This three-day online course will provide students with a cross-disciplinary background in ethical theory and decision-making that can be applied to each individual's field of study.

The theme for this year's course is IDENTITY. Participants will examine individual, community, cultural, national, and global aspects of identity from a variety of disciplinary perspectives—including law, moral philosophy, political science, psychology, sociology, and theology.

Please direct questions to:
Steven Swartzer, PhD
Associate Director for Academic Programs & Strategic Initiatives, Center for Ethics Education sswiftzer@fordham.edu