All students in the Master of Theological Studies program gain competency in four major areas of theological study: scripture, history, systematics, and ethics. Among their six foundational courses, all students take Introduction to Systematic Theology, Introduction to Theological Ethics, one course in Biblical Studies, one course in ancient/medieval religious history, one course in modern/contemporary religious history, and the interdisciplinary methodology course, “Context, Theory, Theology.” In addition, students complete at least two courses that concentrate on Islam, Judaism, or another non-Christian tradition.

At Fordham, theology plays a critical role in the life of the university and the public square. The MTS curriculum is designed to span various historical, theoretical, and methodological approaches, as we pursue our work in productive conversation with other disciplines in the humanities and sciences. In addition to the resources of the Theology Department, students take advantage of the interdisciplinary Center for Jewish Studies, Center for Ethics Education, Center for Medieval Studies, Orthodox Christian Studies Center, and more.

The MTS is designed to prepare students for doctoral studies and other careers requiring advanced proficiency in Theology and Religious Studies. Students choose one of two areas of concentration: Studies in Ancient and Medieval Theology/Religion or Studies in Modern and Contemporary Theology/Religion, as well as relevant language preparation and a capstone research project with their faculty mentor.
