This course will examine the notion of recognition, as well as the related notion of intersubjectivity, in philosophical discourses extending from the late eighteenth century to the present time. The course will begin with a discussion of three central (one might even say "foundational") thinkers on the topic of recognition and intersubjectivity: J.G. Fichte, G.W.F. Hegel, and Karl Marx. The course will then investigate the ways in which subsequent thinkers (influenced by phenomenology, existentialism, structuralism, post-structuralism, pragmatism, and psychoanalysis) responded to, and further developed, the arguments put forward by Fichte, Hegel, and Marx.
